CHAS-207 MANSION HALL Private

circa 1700; circa 1830

In recent years Charles County has lost several of its most important architectural landmarks. Mansion Hall is one that, although now gone, fortunately had several of its significant features recorded before they were lost forever.

A small one and one-half story frame structure with two chimneys at each end, Mansion Hall, like many others of this type, was actually much older than it appeared.

Initially built in the late seventeenth or early eighteenth century as a one-room dwelling, Mansion Hall had several rather remarkable features, including large ceiling beams with their lower edges cut on the sides and bottoms in a double ogee pattern. A similar profile was repeated on a corner stair which had a square post terminating in a knob-like finial, a molded rail and slat balusters. Dr. H. Chandlee Forman has illustrated this stair in several of his publications, referring to it as "the first Jacobean stair found in Maryland."

In about 1830 the house was extensively enlarged, reflecting the increasing economic prosperity of the Gray family, owners of Mansion Hall from the early eighteenth century until 1882.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Since Mansion Hall is today a total ruin, most of the information on which this description is based was derived from physical and historical data published by Dr. H. Chandlee Forman in three of his books on early Maryland architectural (see Bibliography), as well as what fragments of the building have survived for recording.

Measuring 28' square, Mansion Hall was of frame construction, one and one-half stories beneath a dormered gable roof. At each end of the house stood two brick chimneys.

Facing south, the front elevation was three bays wide. entrance door occupied the off-centered middle bay and the windows framed sash of 6-over-9 panes. Across the front was a shed-roofed porch and on the front roof slope two pedimented dormers. The rear, north elevation, also three bays wide, had windows of 4-over-2 pane sash and two pedimented dormers on the roof. There was no porch on this elevation. At the east end were two brick chimneys with stepped weatherings and free-standing stacks. To the left of the southeast chimney was a door that presumably once led to a detached kitchen. the right of the same chimney was a window. A second smaller window was centered in the roof gable. On the west end were two additional chimneys, the larger southwest chimney with brick tiled weatherings and its companion with stepped weatherings. Both had free-standing stacks. Flush to the right of the stack of the smaller chimney was a narrow two-pane window. Centered in the gable was a second window of 4-over-2 panes.

Mansion Hall was initially built as a one-room plus attic house measuring 17' wide by 18' deep. Certain architectural features of the original house indicate that it might have been built as early as the late-seventeenth or early eighteenth century. In about 1830 the house was enlarged by extending it at the east end by about 11' and adding two small rooms across the back, the last giving its roof a "salt box" profile. The two east and one northwest end chimneys, the dormers and the front porch are all contemporary with the c. 1830 alteration. It was also at this time that the entire house was sheathed with flush beaded boards.

It is the original interior woodwork of the oldest part of the house that establishes the significance of Mansion Hall as one of Charles County's most important pre-1750 buildings.

Although by any standards a modest structure, the original Mansion Hall was probably fairly representative of the types (continued on attached sheet) of small utilitarian dwellings lived in by a vast majority of the region's early colonists. However, the builder of Mansion Hall went to great length to improve the interior of the house to the end result that Mansion Hall was a rather extraordinary example of this otherwise simple and very basic house type. Some of these details, later covered by the c. 1830 alterations, escaped the attention of Dr. Forman and are not mentioned in his various discussions of the house. When the house collapsed, these features were revealed and are recorded here.

Because of the extensive alterations and later deterioration that occurred, little is known about the original exterior appearance of the house other than its dimensions and the existence of a west end chimney. It is probable that the door and window closest to the west end of the south front occupied original locations, as well as a door on the rear wall which later became an interior door. A door at the east end opening into the later southeast room was probably originally a window. It is likely that there were no dormers on the roof and that the exterior walls and roof were sheathed with riven clapboards.

On the interior the house had wide pine floorboards and brick nogged walls covered with lath and plaster. The baseboards had a narrow ogee molding on their upper edge. The same narrow ogee profile was used as an applied molding on the narrow window and door surrounds. On all four walls was a 3 1/2" one-piece chairrail, beaded on its top and bottom edge.

Two of the most interesting details are the treatment of the exposed ceiling beams and a short length of balustrade at the base of a corner stair. All of the ceiling beams (4" by 7") had their lower edges molded on the sides and bottoms in a shallow ogee profile, resulting in a very distinctive decorative effect. The stair, which Dr. Forman refers to as "the first Jacobean stair found in Maryland," was largely enclosed within a board sheathed closet located in the northwest corner of the first floor room. Its bottom three treads were, however, exposed and had a balustrade composed of a square post beaded on all four edges and terminating in a knob-like finial, an elaborately shaped rail in a double-ogee profile, and slat balusters cut in a similar pattern. Unfortunately, there is no information available as to the treatment of the fireplace surround or the attic chamber.
